A Biography Beside the Map

- 1 Our new domain began with maps, rivers, roads, and mission fields. Mrs. Lane gave each group a short biography of a nurse who served in villages along a river. A biography tells about a life, and the root bio helped us read that word before we began.
- 2 The map showed why travel was difficult. Some homes were near the main road, but others stood beyond wet fields where a cart could not pass. The nurse carried a portable bag, listened to families, and wrote notes about clean water, fever, and food. Her work was not only about medicine; it was about serving living people in real places.
- 3 We also read biology and biosphere. Biology is the study of life, and the biosphere includes the parts of earth where life is found. Those words made the biography feel connected to the map.
- 4 My response said, "It is possible to understand service better when we study both a person's life and the place where that person worked."
